Porky Pig and Petunia were having a wonderful vacation with Porky's Uncle and Aunt at their cabin in the mountains. They fished and swam in the clear blue lake. They explored the pine woods. They picnicked in shady clearings in the green forest.

One day they took a picnic lunch and wandered far into the woods. Suddenly they heard a low, whimpering murmur behind a screen of thick bushes.

Cautiously they tiptoed to the bushes. Warily they peered around them. Then they both uttered low cries of surprise.

A small, golden-brown doe was lying on the soft grass. Her leg was bleeding. She looked up at Porky and Petunia with pain-filled eyes.

"It's a deer!" Petunia exclaimed.

"Y-Yes! And it's h-hurt!" Porky stuttered.

As they bent over her, the doe's slender body quivered with fear.

"We won't hurt you, little deer," Petunia crooned softly. Tenderly she patted the doe's soft skin.

"Look!" Porky said excitedly. "There's a [illegible] in the deer's leg!"

"We'll have to pull it out and dress the wound," Petunia said practically. "Now I'm glad I took those First Aid lessons at school."

Porky and Petunia worked quickly and gently. Porky held the doe's shaking body and Petunia pulled out the long, jagged thorn. Porky brought fresh, clear water from a little stream. Petunia bathed the deep gash which the thorn had cut in the doe's soft flesh. Then Petunia made a bandage from Porky's clean, white handkerchief.

"There," Petunia said softly to the doe. "That feels better, doesn't it?"

The doe seemed to understand. Her body was no longer trembling, and she looked up at Petunia with wide, grateful eyes.

[illegible] to her. She's hungry," Porky suggested after a moment. "Let's give her our lunch."

So they opened their lunch baskets. The doe nibbled daintily at the sandwiches and she drank every drop of the milk when it was poured into the cup-top of the thermos bottle.

Slowly strength returned to the doe's limbs. She stood up and nibbled around. Gradually her legs grew steadier, until she was walking with only a slight limp.

Porky and Petunia watched her anxiously. They talked to her in low gentle voices, so they wouldn't startle or frighten her. The doe seemed to know that they were her friends. She stayed close to them and even rubbed her soft face against their hands.

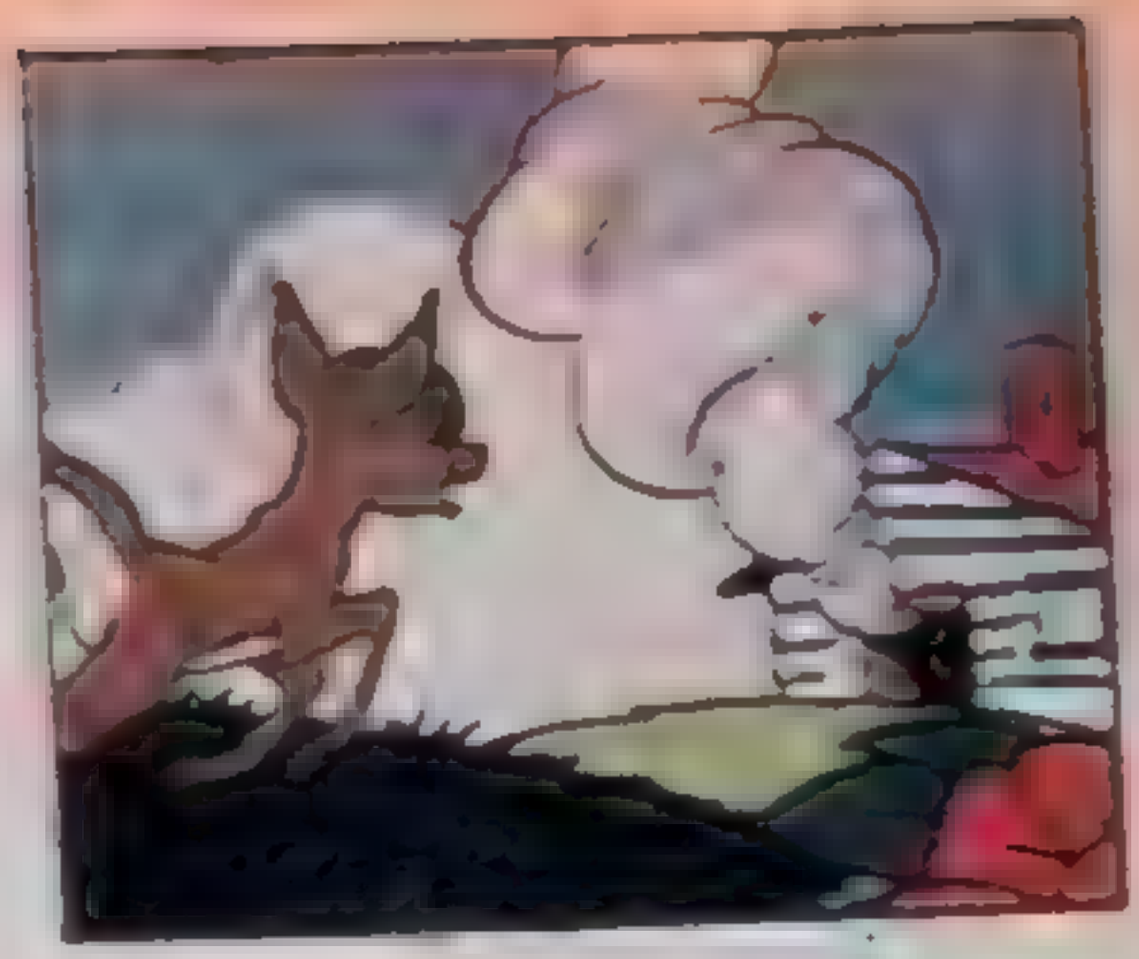
"We ought to be starting home soon," Petunia said finally. "I wish we could take the deer with us."

"Th-She w-wouldn't b-be happy at the c-cabin," Porky answered. "The woods are her h-home. She b-belongs h-here."

So Porky and Petunia said good-bye to the doe and started homeward. As they walked, they glanced backward. A shadowy golden figure was showing through the trees after them.

"The deer is following us," Petunia whispered.

"B-But she w-won't f-follow us f-far," the cr-cabin," Porky protested. "The woods are her h-home. She b-belongs h-here. D-Deers are afraid of p-people."



Porky was right. When he and Petunia crossed the clearing to the cabin, the doe did not follow them. They could see her, standing like a slender gold statue at the edge of the woods.

"I hope we'll see her again someday," Petunia sighed.

"I d-do too," Porky echoed. "B-But she'll g-go b-back to her home in the f-forest and p-probably forget all about us."

Porky, and Petunia talked about the doe until bedtime.

Late that night Petunia wakened suddenly. Someone was pounding on the front door of the cabin. Petunia jumped out of bed and rushed to the window.

The doe was standing in the moonlight by the door. She was balanced on her hind legs and she was pounding on the door with her two front hoofs.

Then Petunia saw the glow of flames from the back of the cabin and smelled the acrid, stinging odor of smoke. The kitchen was on fire!

Quickly Petunia aroused Porky and his Uncle and Aunt.

The little deer came out of the woods to warm us of the fire," she cried.

The four worked frantically, pulling out the hose. When the last spark was out, Porky and Petunia tried to find the doe.

But the doe had disappeared in the [illegible] blackness of the woods.

"S-She s-saved [illegible]," Porky exclaimed. "Oh!" Porky whispered and he and Petunia smiled happily.
